PRESENTATION:

Jennifer Weiss, Special Needs Case Worker for International Rescue Committee (IRC) in Miami provided an overview of a new program IRC has called Intensive Case Management (ICM) in the Miami area. Such programs exist in preferred communities. IRC's Preferred Communities Program in Miami assists with the long term successful integration of refugees in their new communities. Significant portions of newly arrived refugees and other IRC clients are considered vulnerable. The Preferred Communities Intensive Case Management (ICM) Program focuses on providing supportive case management by working with a team to connect clients to needed education, services, and resources necessary to gain self-sufficiency. It provides case management services for up to 12 months to refugees and asylees who have special needs, such as significant medical needs, that cannot be fully addressed through standard resettlement services. By means of a strengths-based, client-centered model of service delivery, the ICM program aims to increase self-reliance and community integration among the most vulnerable clients. Services include connecting them with internal and external resources, closely monitoring their progress through a series of assessments, and helping them achieve long-term goals through their service plan.
